REality Elegy

(Part of Narrative Poem) blood-red mire under tank tracks is it blossoms of January’s plum or June’s scholar-tree?

a face’s vast expanse squeezed out from gaps between iron and steel spun into a vortex of stone as you have taken the steps that can’t enmesh you as you suddenly remember there’s even a faint whiff of perfume a sweet noose around your neck as the seasons photocopy every flattened and crushed petal so that you don’t know what time you died the sound of which Day of the Dead rain isn’t sewing your silken eyes when your astonishment splatters out with a gunshot’s crack plural first times eavesdrop on the one and only time tears blisteringly hot but empty we have taken the steps that can’t enmesh us as rumbling axles trundle beneath trouser turn-ups in the College of International Relations dorm’s dark corridors lamps are always lit the frying-pan twilight leaning close on the frozen twilight of the public toilet January’s waterfall flushes away names he shouted in dreams the north wind hugs a photo album and wails death eager as childbirth       death that can’t cope with shame the age he pursues to face the ever-larger and larger snowflakes in the pupils of mother’s eyes a hexagonal diamond cold hides in the plum blossom rain of the renovated sickroom scholar-tree blossom rain thunders down like shrapnel do you recognize it?

denied white bloats the white that year by year went on growing denied flesh conceals the sewer’s gaze
do you recognize it?

do we recognize between the rubbernecking stars (the witch said) relatives reborn together? judged by endlessly-destroyed history to be relatives in the depth of a black marble headstone mother brushes by       lo, what night be this?

brushing by       the families turn       the tank tracks turn night bangs the little room’s window open the field stares at him coming back to find a will-o-the-wisp lighting up the bedside table first love throttled among broken glass covering the floor bricks with the fine sand of snowflakes reflecting a dazzling white stripe on the wall little black dog screaming in pain as it’s flayed nailed still screaming in pain remnant ruins like symmetry the less others can see the more he’s astonished days of parting are always the Day of the Dead raindrops count down a grainy cosmos carved in miniature in each raindrop handwriting faint on wet white bandages school badge twinkles in the midden under the jade stair the rancid skeleton of a bike it can’t enmesh you because you don’t know what time you died moonlight’s many existences seem to be missing forgetting grows like a sexy daughter only having one story in our life makes us dizzy our too many stories every book holds a branch of leaden lilac between the pages a never-changing volume from one plant endlessly tugging a still emptier beauty coming back    the room empty now    lovers truly gone the drama of death has twisted their faces the brass door handle    grips tight the hand that carries a full tub of fresh oysters a full tub of sight spilt on the mouldy carpet the letterbox he opens bears a substitute name he thought it was his address    read it out souls fill the stage    brains spurt out as the axe falls hung by the neck to swing in the wind    never lacking passion detonate a flash of magnesium on the blue sea to light up the distant gaze    under the stair’s recording the laugh of the long-dead who have only now been returned pathetically buried in his foreign self the tears of the petals should stupefy the nothingness of petals tears leaking from writing paper of squares should stupefy    the transformed nothingness of a line of verse the world is no more and no less than a flagstone that seals up dying you should weep for your forgetting    we have forgotten and still forget only then will we join in the weeping for this verbless verb infer unweeping from endless weeping with original human moistness refuse to add yet more moistness the blue sky speeds past at full tilt tank tracks repeat all death is simply a private matter in the end stamping the metal taps of children dancing

CID undercover agents trouble factories grassing gardeners

AIDS villages charcoal-kiln slaves Taliban Marguerite soaring naked Revolutionary Committees super fanboys G20 Ground Zero grave-robbers vandals

Cambodian skulls The Disappeared inventors of calendars makers of sentences me anyone

it’s never too late to go back to the surface a rain shower brings the valley gloom south-facing windows soaked portrait of bitter clarity like long standing watermint in former familiarity the orange web feet of wild ducks tread on him the sound of water winnowing the empty pearls of bubbles green tongues sing a dimming dirge backwards

Nero a rival for the wicked emperor of Sui vast expanse of water how he dips how he sucks at the snot of blossoming floating fingers soak into the surfaces of moonlight and this poem the vast expanse in one drop of water fabricated grief chisels through January and June stamens sometimes plum sometimes scholar-tree the Troy in endless bedrooms empties a white tunic play-acting the woman the moon of the dead stands by a brand-new memorial gate night fiddles with the shape of it a camera set to anniversaries shoots on

ABSENCE

with a single candle before mother’s picture-frame with the railings of light that nail down a city in a tall pavilion laying sex bare site stuck in the darkness no final farewell for final farewells on a bridge of writing looking at a river turbid with numberless self-drownings in slow release someone hiding at the fishing gets a hook in the jaw there are no words for this moment set in three hundred million year-old coral set on his desk a rotting one of a kind matching in silence the exquisite dismissal in the blue sky nothing that isn’t flashback to reflect a bolt of silk on chilly water the quill pens of all the banking’s beard-grass shine silver a lifetime signing the tastiest chill in the air no other absolute but the blind eye in love with the reason that is made up for yourself so write a poem only worth writing to yourself again provoked to be its own creation reality is not a subject one face mashed between words of iron and steel is nobody’s the flag’s handclapping fades with the sound of the wind the place where a tent was pitched straightaway sent to the place of a bowl of water is it here?

your steps our steps in the sound of metallic rain a place of wet and sticky running away is it here?

but where is here?

where is this ABSENCE OF SOMEONE? the daily Day of the Dead that can’t enmesh the petals banished a tender life that knew no exhaustion reincarnated green from the never-reincarnated brings out an eye evastness stuck in the throat pale pale purple fabricates a swaying pose most expert in the fantasies of flowing flowing turned into the unendurable miracle of flesh watermint holds the ashes in a powder-puff a day of not vomiting tank tracks a day of living sacrifice the crack seawater surges through pouring into blind sound “tonight for myself for you for leaving I weep” arrive beyond astonishment go on dying

Poem by Yang Lian
Translated by Brian Holton